Just as the title says, for example: take 10 $ [[True,False],[True,False]..] This code should simply return False, since the first list is empty. But the output is False for the first and True for the second, or 1 for the first and 0 for the second, or 4 for the first and 3 for the second, etc. Why is this, and what is the solution? A: The reason this happens is that there are a lot of different ways that a tuple of a form [True, False] can be reordered. For example, the two elements could be swapped or the first element could be omitted, leaving you with [False, True]. So, it ends up being hard to say with certainty what order the two values are in. For example, given a list of the form [[True, False], [True, False]], it's not always possible to decide if that last True will appear before or after the first False. To prevent the order from being reversed, the function is defined using the strict version of the tuple operation () instead of the functor () or the safe version (), where you bind your variables with a transformer and use the safe version. If you use the safe version, you can rely on the fact that the ordering of a tuple won't be reversed if it's reordered. The safe version is semantically equivalent to the unsafe version, but it's an optimization of the safe version. A: The () function is strict by

A three-year monitoring programme of total suspended particulates (TSP) and respirable suspended particulates (RSP) was established at a lead-acid battery plant. The determination of these particulates was based on the impaction method on glass fibre filters. The results of the study showed that TSP averaged 23.3 +/- 1.0 (S.D.) mg/m3 (n = 12) during operation and 2.6 +/- 0.1 (n = 12) during shutdown, with a maximum concentration of 40 mg/m3 recorded on several days. In terms of RSP, the concentration of respirable particulate matter exceeded the national target limit of 50 micrograms/m3 for the working day (16 h) except for one occasion during shutdown. The average ratio of RSP to TSP was 1:75. The physical-chemical characteristics of the particulate material were investigated. It was found that the particulates were mainly composed of sulfate salts with some carbonates. The concentration of elemental lead was found to vary from 0.15 to 0.70%.Astronauts were among the first people to live a truly space
