The amplitude of the electroretinogram (ERG) contains directional information as well. The amplitude of different ERG components changes with regard to eye position, and the directional information is encoded within the amplitude of the ERG component. Further, there are substantial differences in response amplitude between the two eyes; this interocular asymmetry is affected by position. In the present study we have examined the directional information and interocular asymmetries in the averaged amplitude of the ERG components (ERG mean). The directional information in the ERG mean was maximal in the parvocellular pathway in a temporal-to-nasal direction, whereas the other pathway was more directional in a nasal-to-temporal direction. The interocular asymmetry was maximal in the parvocellular pathway in a temporal-to-nasal direction, and the other pathway was more directional in a nasal-to-temporal direction. The results suggest that the directional information in the ERG mean is coded both anisotropically and differently in the two visual pathways.~ jacquesm I still find it weird that for the simple 2 files option that it shoves the exit code in the logs, just that one occurrence
