Read PDF Math Makes Sense 6 Practice And Homework Book Answer Key . Grade 1 (PDF 1.1 MB, 39 pages). This article is more than 1 year old This article is more than 1 year old The City of Sydney is to ban the use of facial recognition software by security agencies in the centre of Sydney, in a move that has been welcomed by civil liberties groups and privacy advocates. The ban is the city's response to the state government's ongoing review of the use of surveillance technology, which has been conducted by a special advisory council of academics, security and privacy experts. The council recommended the ban in its final report, released on Wednesday, the council said. "The new ban not only takes away the government's ability to use these intrusive and invasive powers, it recognises the significant privacy risks and challenges of facial recognition in public spaces and in crowded environments such as public transport," said Steve Jolly, the chair of the council. NSW government says no facial recognition trials at public events Read more "As a city, we are committed to making a place where people feel safe and welcome to go about their lives. We also take the protection of our people and their personal information seriously and believe this is a responsible action," he said. The ban will be in place from Wednesday until 2023. The report recommends that the new policy be implemented with the expectation that there will be further cost-benefit analyses of facial recognition technology. But Stephen Poer, a professor in the department of engineering at the University of NSW, said the ban would not go far enough. Sign up to receive the top stories from Guardian Australia every morning "We're hearing about the national rollout. They are trying to play catch up," he said. "NSW is not doing a good job of really getting up to speed with that technol
