Lightroom 5 on the iPad Pro with Apple Pencil rocks, at least on iPadOS 10.2.1. I've been using it with the Pencil reliably for a couple of months now, so I do enjoy it. Lightroom is a powerful app on iPad, but I've had problems with Photoshop CC, including running into maximum RAM limits. After bumping up my RAM allotment by a full GB, Lightroom 5 performance is any day now better than on the iPhone. This is an app I want to keep on my iPad for as long as I possibly can without physical screen fragmentation. I'm able to do my photo editing, as well as export and print while using the Pencil. Another new tool is the Radial Filter. This tool allows you to quickly remove or create unwanted objects like sky, grass, or cars. In this tool, you can remove an object with an extremely broad set of powerful tools. You can remove multiple parts of an image, remove objects in any size, and even fill them with a specific color. The Radial Filter works really well with some categories, like cars, and seems to be better with certain subject types than others. It is also better with mimicking the look of older Photoshop filters such as the Dodge and Burn tools. But it can struggle on objects, like tiny flags. Generally, new tools like these are great examples of the potential for software developers to create potentially useful new plugins that benefit users. There is also an updated adjustment brush. One criticism is that the paintbrush is not very intuitive. For example, you can't apply dark backgrounds or correct white balance easily. This is a minor gripe, however, and the brush is surprisingly useful and versatile.
